The Actuaries

The future of work

The Covid-19 pandemic has fundamentally changed the world of work and led to a massive transformation. Companies, but above all employees, are feeling the change – employees work mostly from their desks at home and offices are empty. The new world of work brings new challenges but also offers opportunities. How the world of work could develop after the pandemic – especially in the US – is analyzed by Deloitte in the article "The post-pandemic economy: How we work." While the new world of work has primarily changed the location of work, it is also creating new opportunities in job seeking. Our article "The future of work - new flexibility and greater choice" describes the impact on job seeking. An exciting report from the field is offered by Christoph Krischanitz, Senior Manager at Milliman, who talks in his interview about his cross-border work, which he does from his desk at home. In our fourth article, JCW looks at the pros and cons of the new world of work from the recruiter's perspective.

The postpandemic economy: How we work

COVID-19's changes to how we work are creating broad ripple effects. The pandemic brought work into the home for many and changed the nature of much in-person work as well. Adapting to this reality has set in motion waves of follow-on impacts that flow through much of the economy. Deloitte explains in its article what it could mean for the US economy if these patterns persist.

A recruiter's perspective on the rise of working from home

For some employees, working from home is a blessing, while many others miss the personal exchange with colleagues and the sense of community. In its article, JCW looks at both sides from the recruiter's perspective and recommends an individual mix.
