Lifelong learning - grow your knowledge

"There is no shame in knowing nothing, but in not wanting to learn anything." Plato already recognized that learning is an important part of life. Lifelong learning beyond school and university, whether in professional or private life, is a never-ending process. But what exactly does the concept of "lifelong learning" mean? Find out in our article "Lifelong learning – a never ending story". In our interview with Henning Wergen, Managing Director of the European Actuarial Academy (EAA), we talk about how to provide Europe-wide training for actuaries and what challenges there are in international cooperation on these topics.

Technological advances, demographic shifts, and the constant need to improve employee skills are driving massive changes in corporate training. How Deloitte is developing new ways to foster a culture of learning across the organization is described in the article "Learning – Employees take charge". Last but not least, ERGO explains in its article why corporate education is still important and how to teach important topics across the board while enabling individualization.

Working Life

Lifelong learning - never ending story

Digitalization, societal changes or political realignments – constant change presents us with new challenges in our everyday lives and at work. We need to educate ourselves and keep pace in order to understand and use new technologies. The key term "lifelong learning" brings this together and encompasses continuing education in a political and social context. What the concept means exactly and why you should never stop learning new things is explained in this article.

Learning - Employees take charge

The pressure on organizations to improve learning and development continues to intensify. Advances in technology, shifts in demographics, and the constant competitive need to upgrade workforce skills are disrupting corporate learning. These forces are pushing companies to develop new ways to put employees in charge of their learning experience and foster a culture of learning throughout the organization. In Deloitte's article we learn more about these new developments.

In-house training – from soft skills to compliance

In-house training remains an important topic – even in times of digitalization and easy access to knowledge. Employees need to be trained across the board and on a regular basis in order to stay up to date. In its article, ERGO explains which forms of further training are offered in its company and what content is taught. The training courses range from technical topics to soft skills and compliance.
