Sharpening your skillset: The foundation to advance your career

No matter if you are a young professional, having profound knowledge in your field or if you are a senior in leading position: When promoting your skillset, some ground rules are not likely to change. But do you really know how to best present your skills – whether it's preparing your documents, performing in a job interview or advancing within your company? How to find a good ratio between highlighting and developing soft and hard skills? On the other hand, if you are employing, which of your applicant's merits should you pay close attention to?

Today's newsletter provides you with answers to those and further questions: Sarah Schadek-Keane, Director Germany at our content partner Emerald Group, will give you exclusive insights on how to perfectly position your skills throughout any application process. Also, we investigate today's most important soft and hard skills in the actuary profession, as well as those to come. Kartina Tahir Thomson, Board member of the Actuarial Association of Europe (AAE) and incoming President-Elect of the Institute and Faculty of Actuaries, draws a forecast on which skillsets actuaries will need in a globalized work environment.

Five

Most experts agree that an actuary needs to master at least five basic skills. It usually comes down to an analytical view, math and computer skills, business and finance expertise as well as communications and interpersonal competence. Admittedly, these represent the "lowest common denominator" (LCD) of actuarial skills. But they symbolize the fact that actuaries spend their whole professional life advancing their knowledge.
